A Light On A Hill

March 2017

Mama, my grandmother, had moved into an Assisted Living/Nursing Home in her home town of Nashville. This was hard for all of us. Mama was the matriarch, the center of our family. She gave us constant love and encouragement to accomplish great things. And she showed us what a Christian was and taught us how important the church and family are. We were all having trouble coping with the idea of Mama being near to the end.

Mama seemed to handle the whole thing better than us. When we visited, she was still Mama. She was just living in a single room with only a few of her antiques and family items. She was still the family head. Our heart.

The next time we went to Nashville, Gloria and I found ourselves leading our boys to that room where Mama now lived. She told us that we needed to go to the activity room, a large room with lots of chairs, a couple of tables and a piano. She introduced us to some of the other residents who all seemed remarkably uninterested. Mama was sure that they just needed to know us a little better.

So she moved us to the front of the room. She turned around as if in our old home church, and said, "This is my grandson, Butch. He is a preacher." A pause to give them time to appreciate how great I was. I would have been embarrassed if anyone was paying attention. Undeterred, Mama said, "He is going to bring us a devotion (complete news to me, I began to rack my brain for a quick, appropriate idea.

Fortunately I had time to think about it. Mama was not through.) “And this is his son John who is an excellent pianist. He is going to play us a song now.” Not terror on John’s face, but close to it. She sat down in the front row to enjoy us.

John was about twelve. He went to the piano and played something. I remember he did an amazing job. Gloria led a song or two. Music over, they sat down. I stood up and read a little Scripture and gave a few thoughts.

As I looked at the first row of seats, I saw a relieved Mark, Matthew and Joseph who realized they were not next. I saw Gloria smile at me encouragingly. I looked at the other three or four rows. Residents who were mostly awake but obviously not listening or caring about any of this. Ready to go back to watching television.

And in the middle of the front row, I saw Mama beaming. So full of pride. Unaware of the others in the room. Certain that they had to be amazed at her grandson and his family. Remembering her smile still brings tears to my eyes.

As we walked back toward her room, she nodded to the others in the room. She did not say it, but her look said, “My family. Really something aren’t they?” We walked down the hall, thankful the show was over.

Mama was not with us much longer. She and I talked in her room one day not long after this. She wanted to talk about what was coming and the funeral she wanted. She felt relief knowing it would be done the way she wanted it done. The right way. She knew that while we dealt with her funeral she would be in heaven with Jesus and with my Granddaddy. She was prepared.

I will always be thankful for seeing Mama in the front row that day. Smiling at me. Light glinting off of her glasses. A little nod. Her smile telling me how much she loved me. And how proud she was of me.

I like to think it was the look she got when she entered heaven. The look on the face of Jesus as he opened His arms to her. Love and pride. Well done, Mama.

As you make your way through Lent toward Easter this year, I hope you will ask yourself a question. What look will Jesus give you one day?
